Data collected through a virtual study suggested that 87.6 per cent of employees think that virtual and online recruitment is a boon. They agree that virtual recruitment and remote jobs have opened up a plethora of job opportunities and have aided in improving employment statistics.

The survey by staffing company Genius Consultants suggests that 87.4 per cent of employees think virtual hiring is a convenient way of reaching out to candidates and vice-versa with added advantages like scheduling meetings and interviews at mutually convenient times, etc. On the contrary, 12.3 per cent of employees felt that online recruitment is not working out as a viable option.

The report also mentions that while the global market is opening gradually, and with the current vaccination drive in full swing, it is still imperative to ensure the safety of people. Once the immunization process is completed, things will get back to normal, with going back-office and in-person meetings becoming mandatory.
